Asparagus was first planted in California during the 1850s in the San Joaquin Delta. By 1903, more than 6,000 acres were being cultivated and this grew to 36,000 acres in the 1990s. Today, fewer than 1,000 acres remain in California.
In the sixteenth century, asparagus gained popularity in France and England. France’s King Louis XIV preferred the vegetable and demanded his gardeners grow it year-round. The royal gardeners developed stove houses and hotbeds to keep the royal kitchen in supply.

Asparagus originally grew wild in Russia, the Mediterranean, the British Isles, and parts of Africa. In nature, the plant often grew along seashores and riverbanks.
